

Re-Working the Work-Week

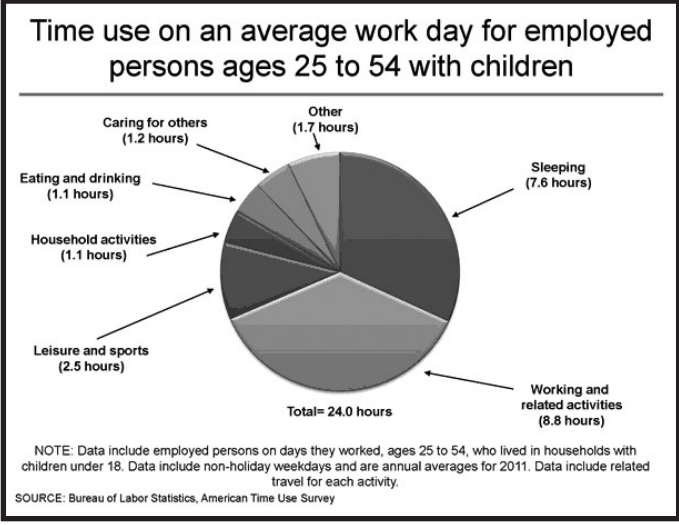

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

Re-Working the Work-Week

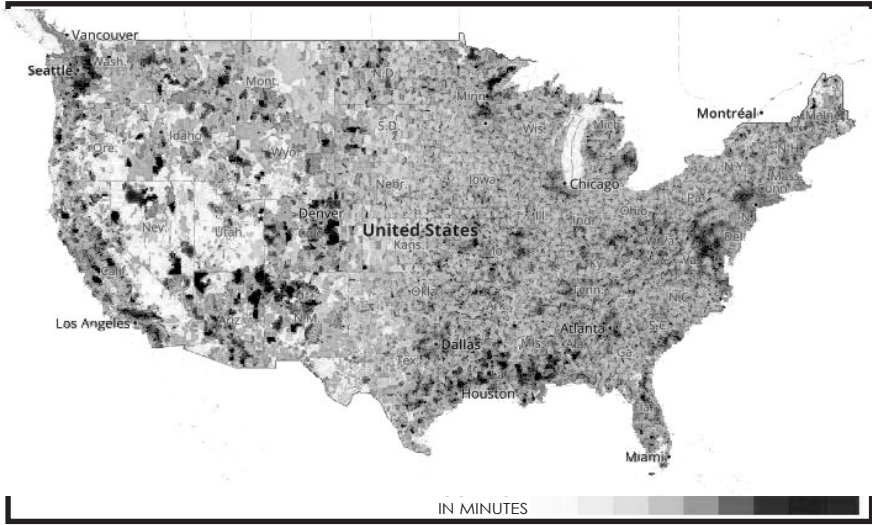

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

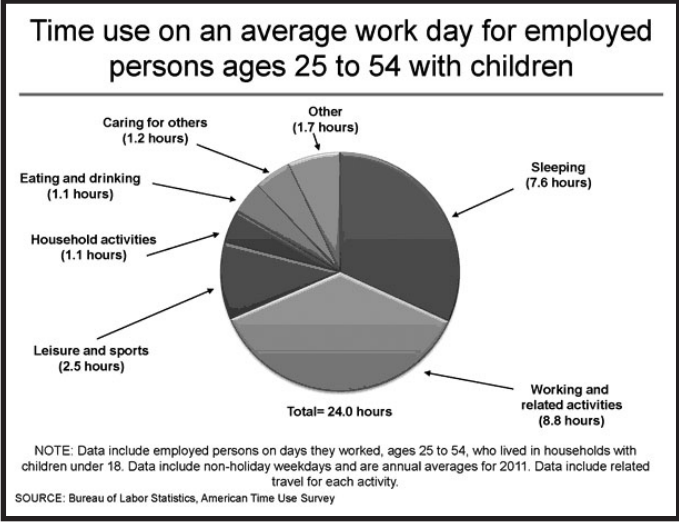

The average American with children, aged 25 - 54 years old, approximately 60% of the day is spent either at work or asleep leaving little time for leisure and/or family time after household duties are accomplished.

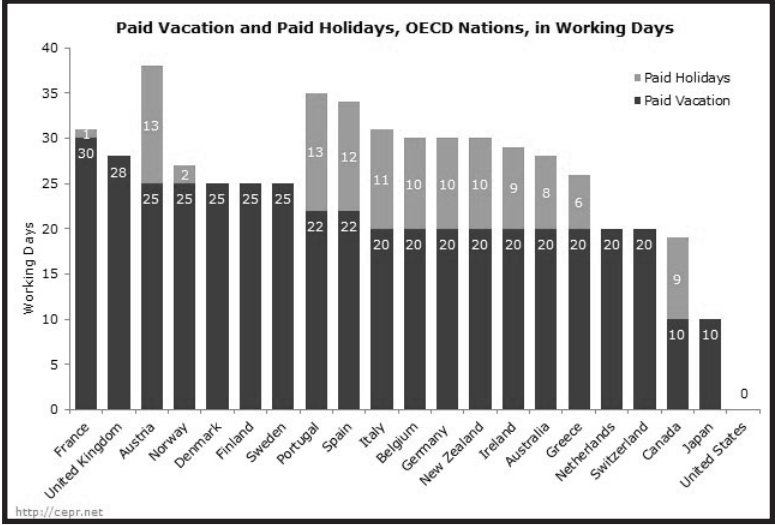

Re-Working the Work-Week

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

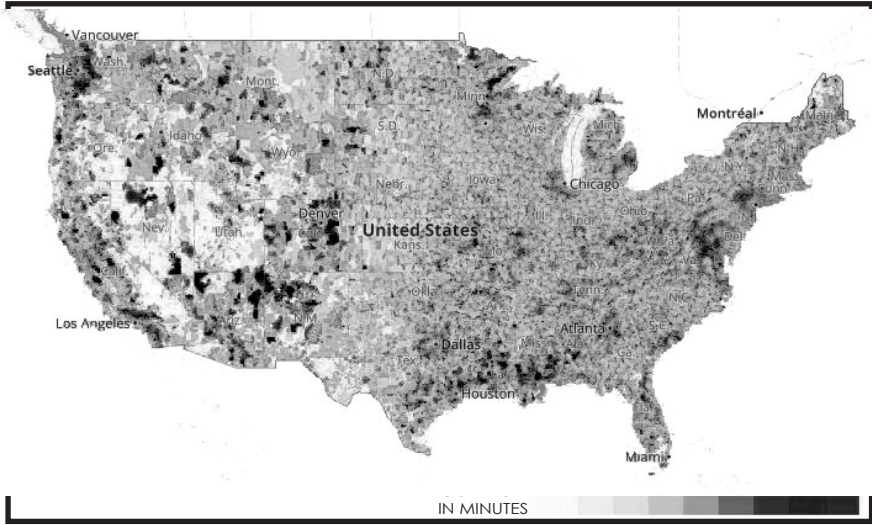

The average American with children, aged 25 - 54 years old, approximately 60% of the day is spent either at work or asleep leaving little time for leisure and/or family time after household duties are accomplished.

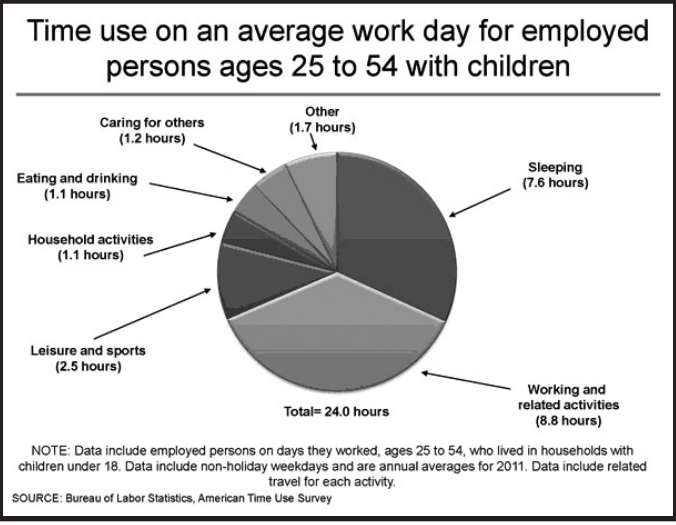

Americans spend more time annually at work than any other country in the world. The United States is the only developed nation without mandated paid time off and without paid parental time off offered to both parents.

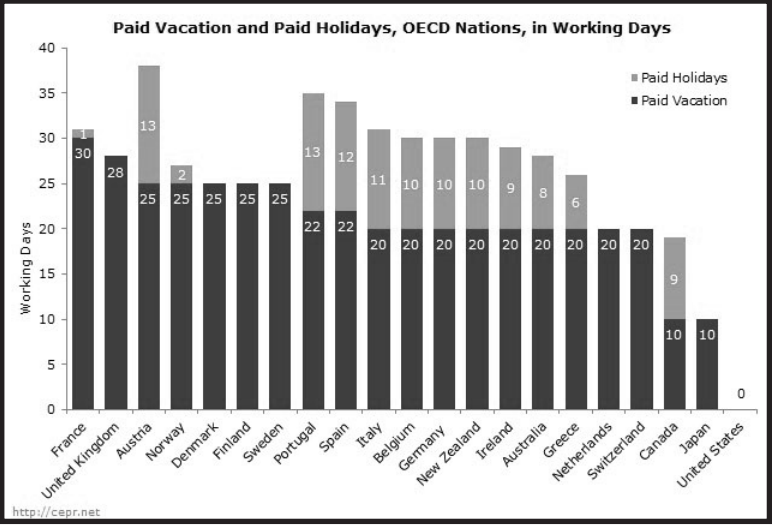

Re-Working the Work-Week

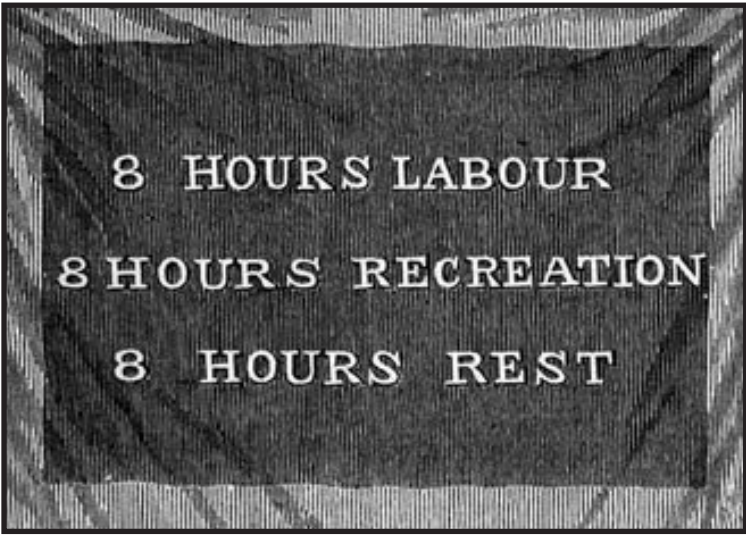

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

The average American with children, aged 25 - 54 years old, approximately 60% of the day is spent either at work or asleep leaving little time for leisure and/or family time after household duties are accomplished.

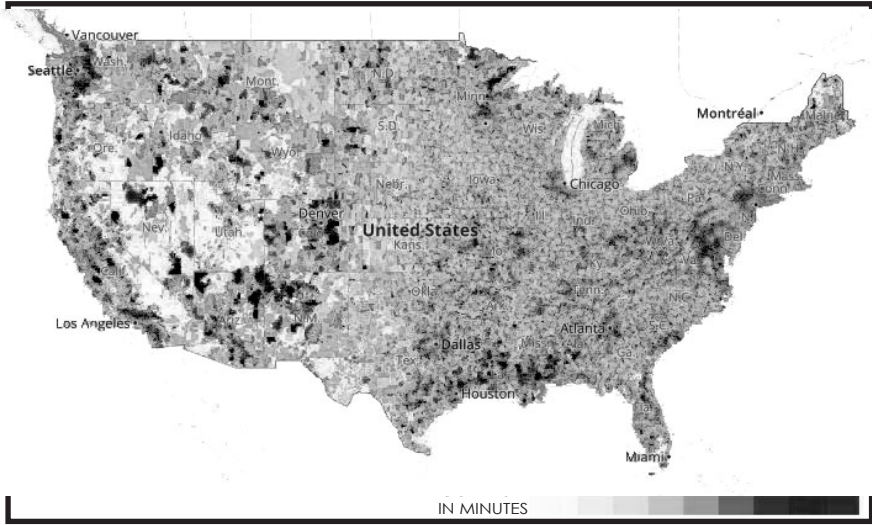

Americans spend more time annually at work than any other country in the world. The United States is the only developed nation without mandated paid time off and without paid parental time off offered to both parents.

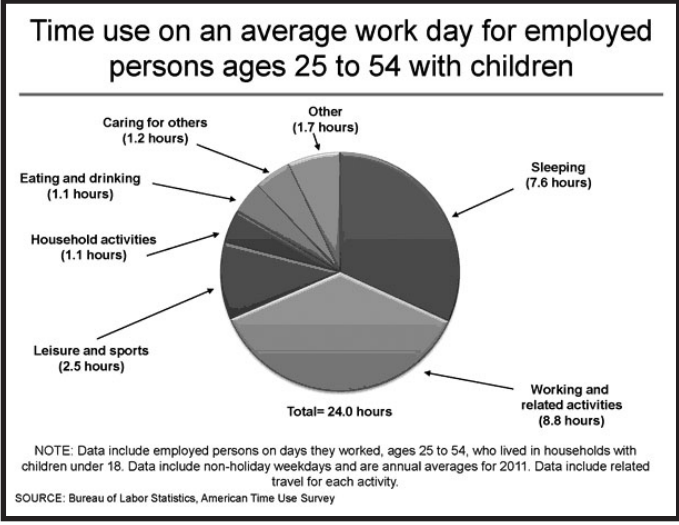

The typical 8-hour work day was in response to the exhausting ten, twelve, and sixteen hour work days that arose as a product of industrialization and the strive for 24/7 optimization and efficiency.

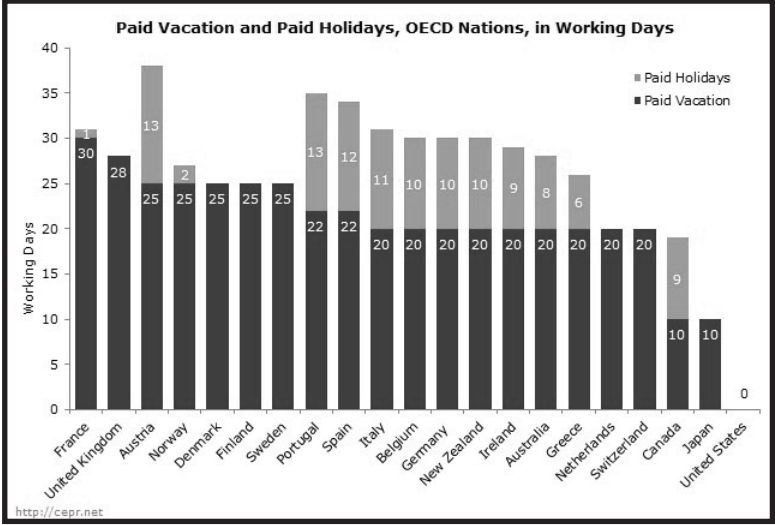

Re-Working the Work-Week

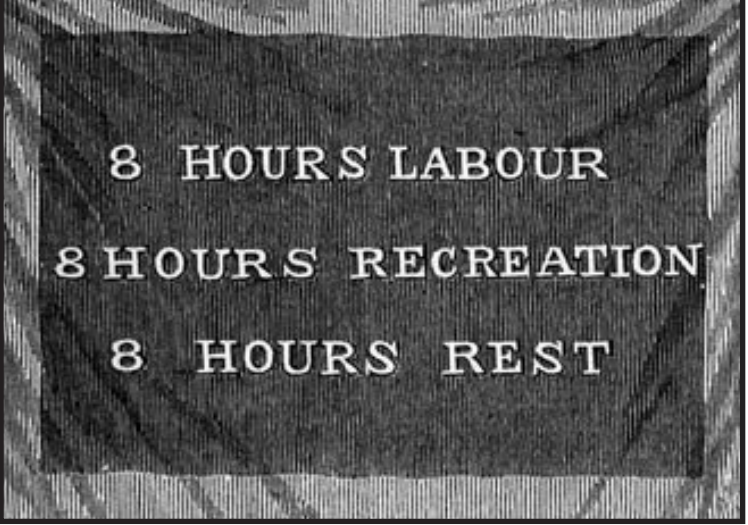

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

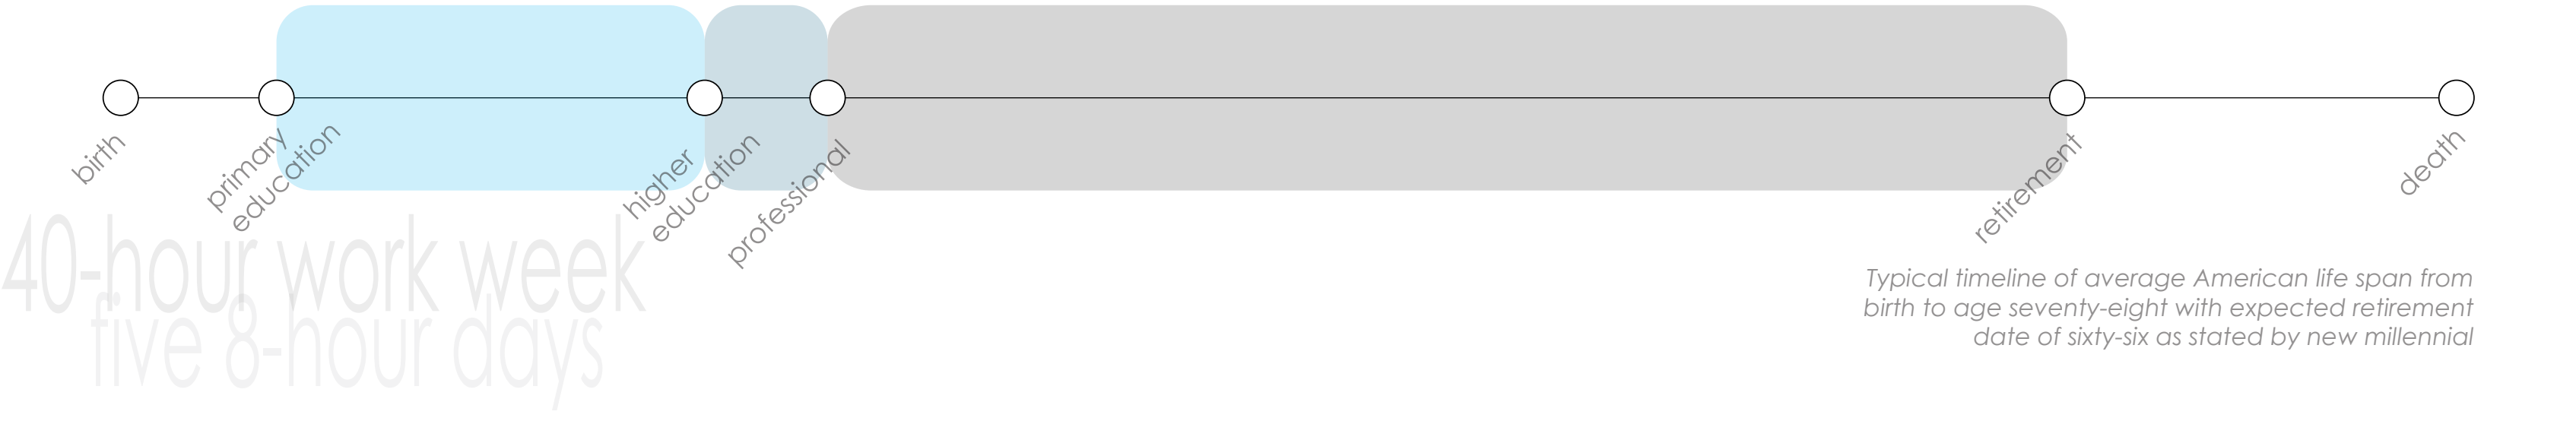

The average American with children, aged 25 - 54 years old, approximately 60% of the day is spent either at work or asleep leaving little time for leisure and/or family time after household duties are accomplished.

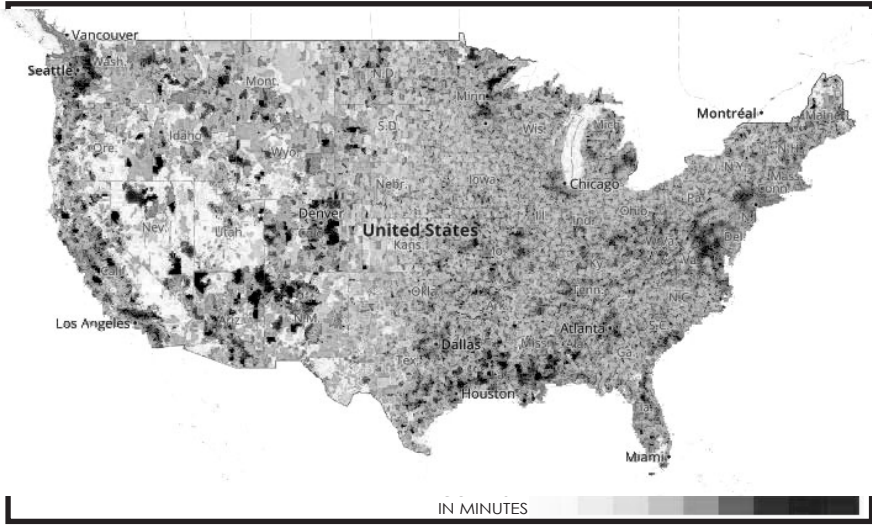

Americans spend more time annually at work than any other country in the world. The United States is the only developed nation without mandated paid time off and without paid parental time off offered to both parents.

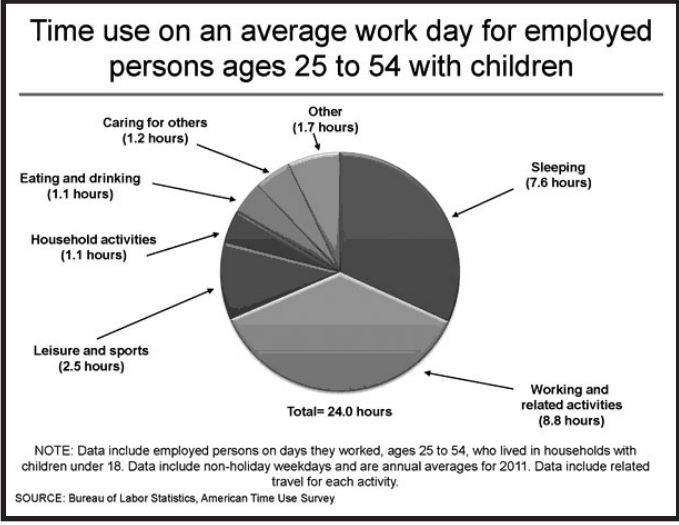

The typical 8-hour work day was in response to the exhausting ten, twelve, and sixteen hour work days that arose as a product of industrialization and the strive for 24/7 optimization and efficiency.

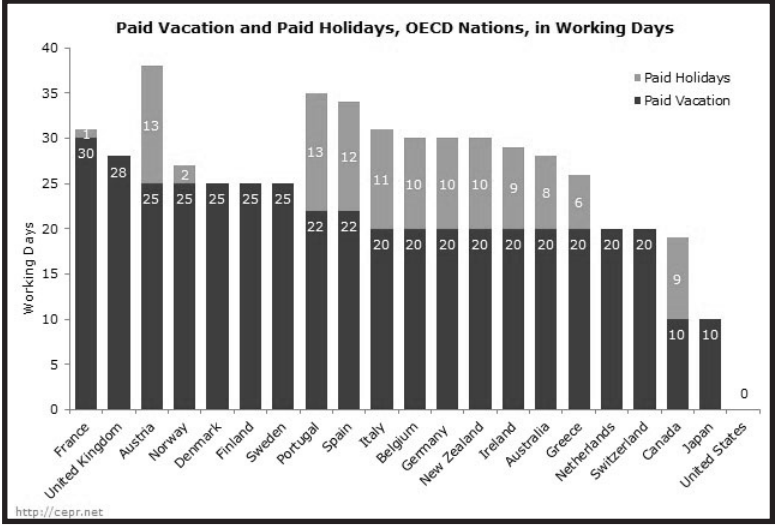

Re-Working the Work-Week

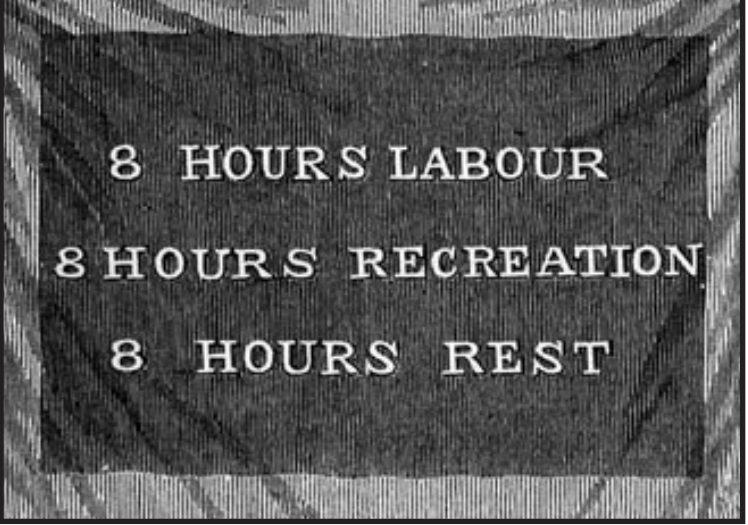

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

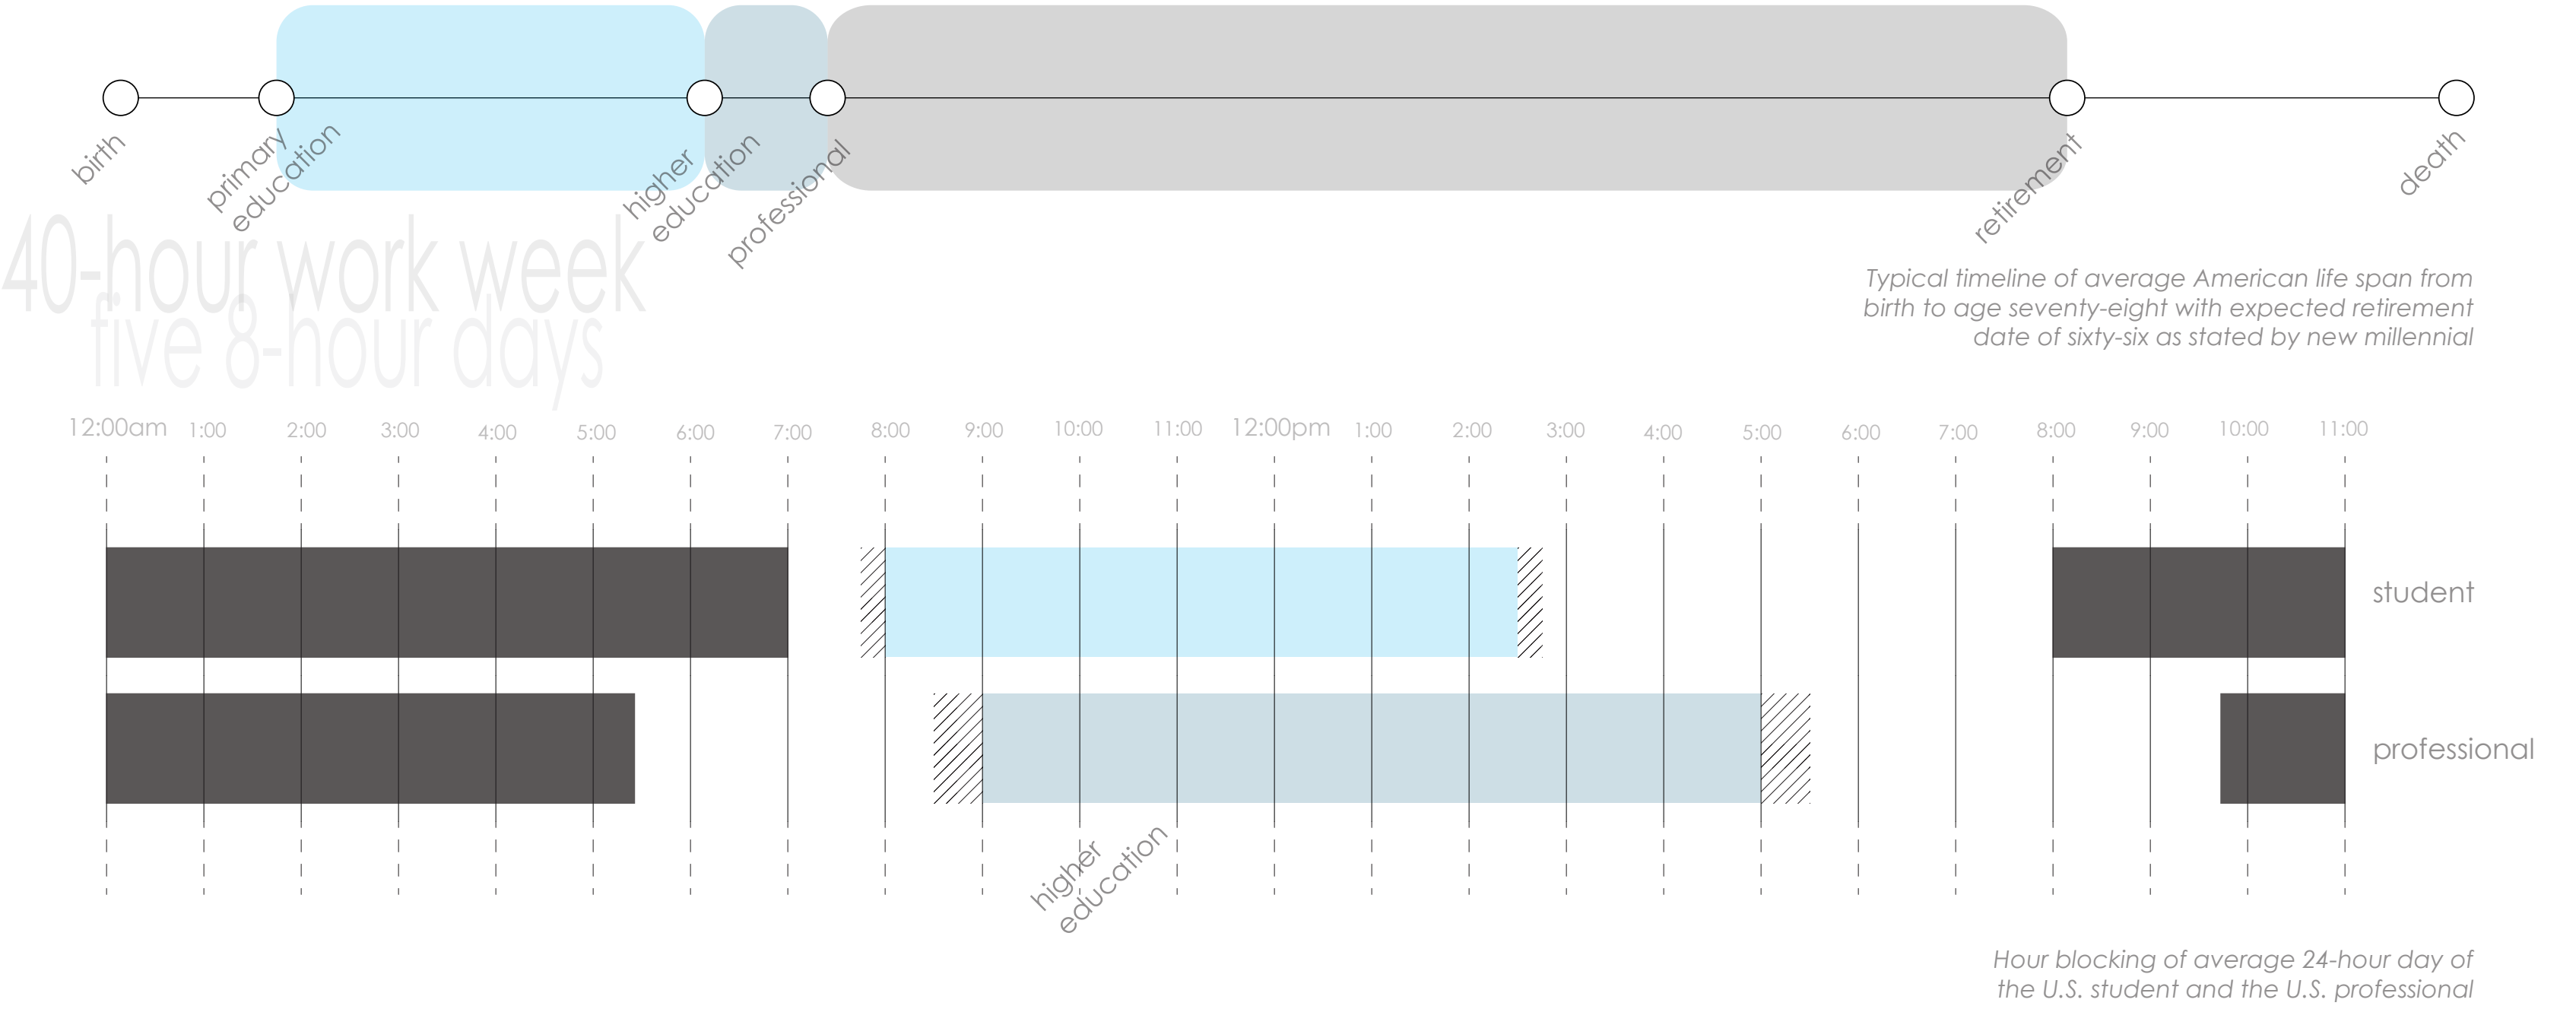

The average American with children, aged 25 - 54 years old, approximately 60% of the day is spent either at work or asleep leaving little time for leisure and/or family time after household duties are accomplished.

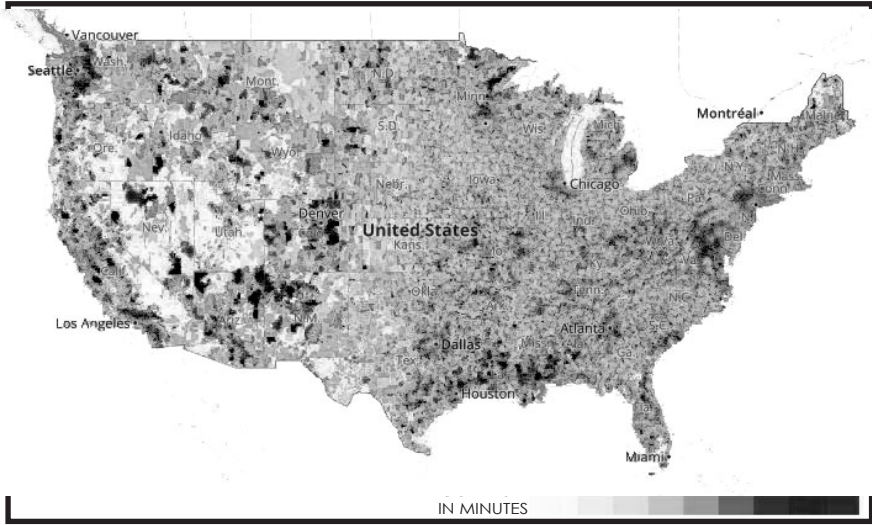

Americans spend more time annually at work than any other country in the world. The United States is the only developed nation without mandated paid time off and without paid parental time off offered to both parents.

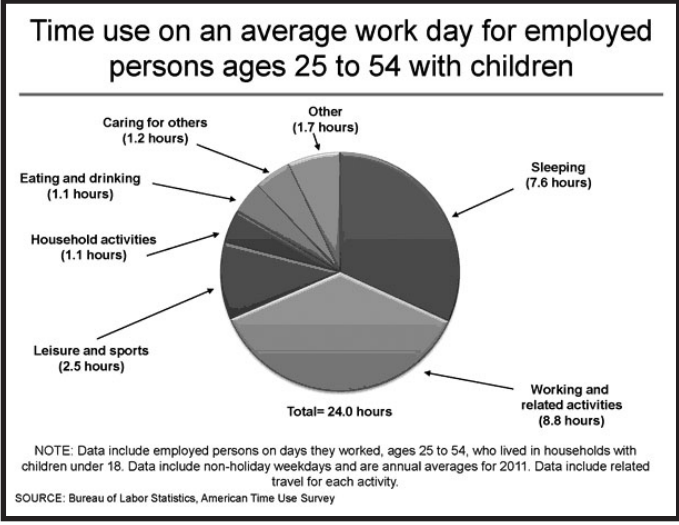

The typical 8-hour work day was in response to the exhausting ten, twelve, and sixteen hour work days that arose as a product of industrialization and the strive for 24/7 optimization and efficiency.

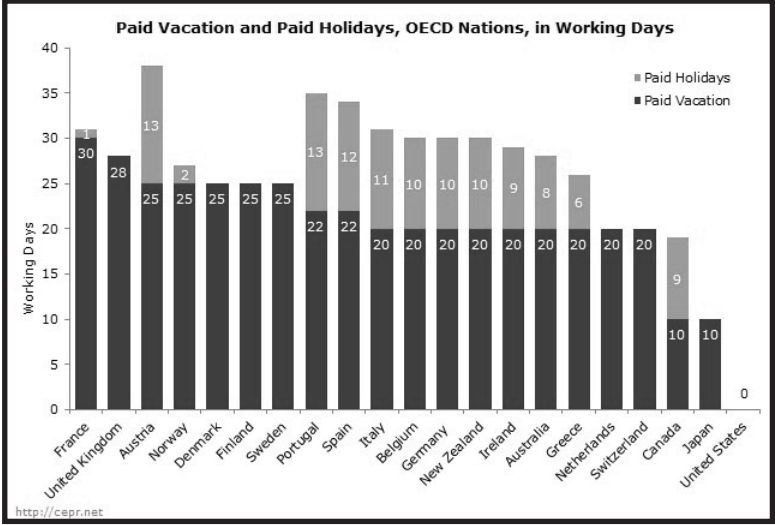

Re-Working the Work-Week

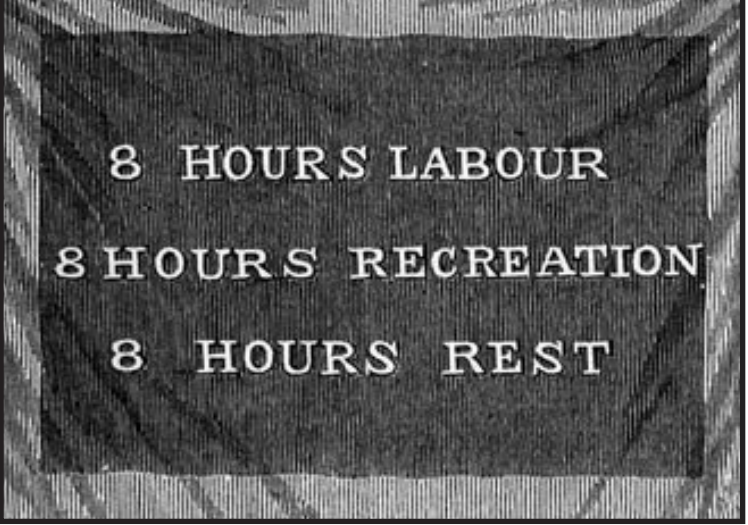

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

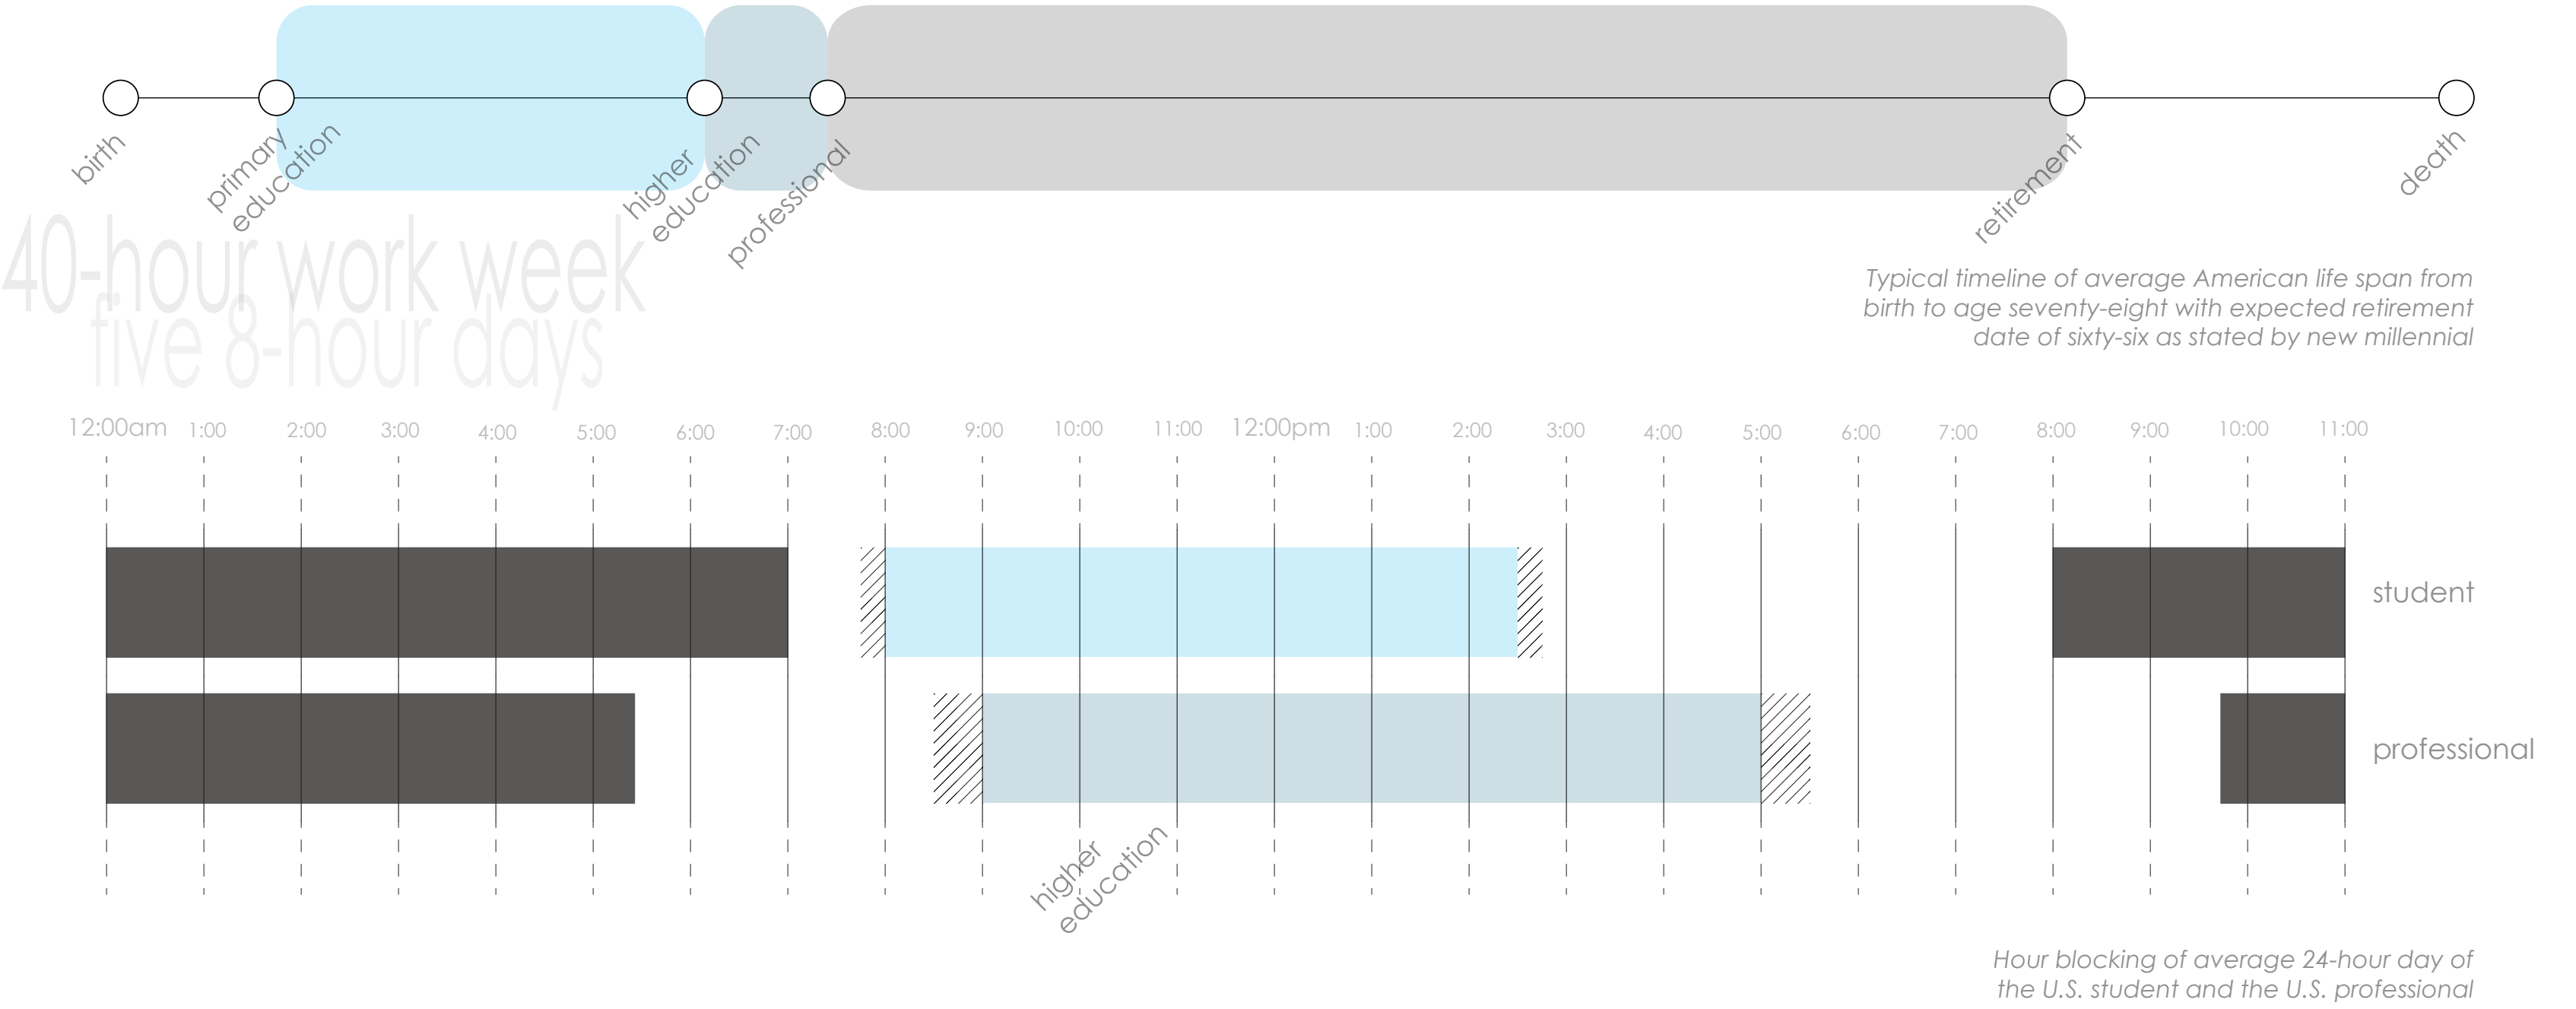

The average American with children, aged 25 - 54 years old, approximately 60% of the day is spent either at work or asleep leaving little time for leisure and/or family time after household duties are accomplished.

Americans spend more time annually at work than any other country in the world. The United States is the only developed nation without mandated paid time off and without paid parental time off offered to both parents.

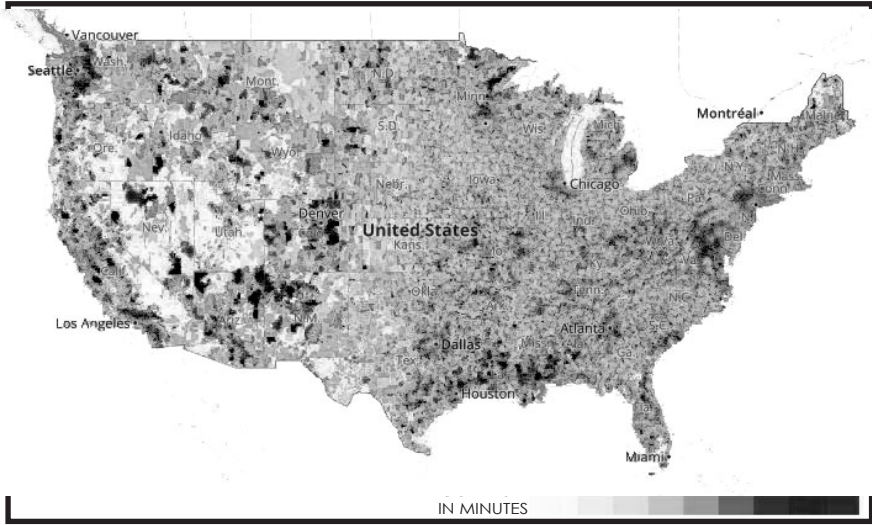

The typical 8-hour work day was in response to the exhausting ten, twelve, and sixteen hour work days that arose as a product of industrialization and the strive for 24/7 optimization and efficiency.

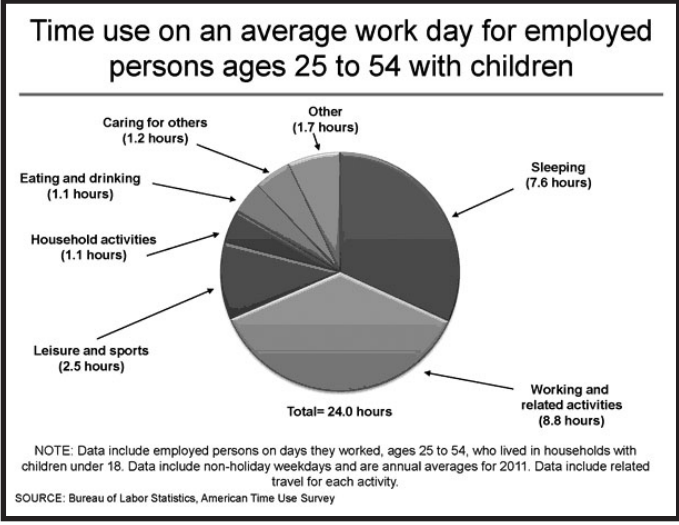

30-hour work week
five 6-hour days

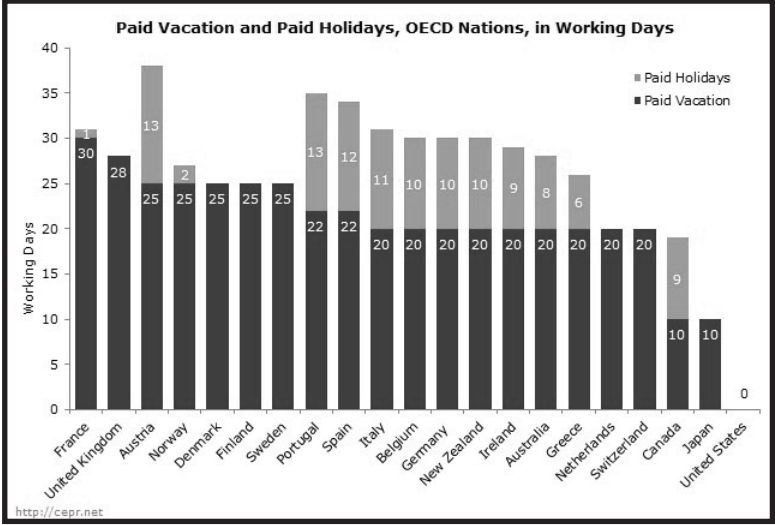

Re-Working the Work-Week

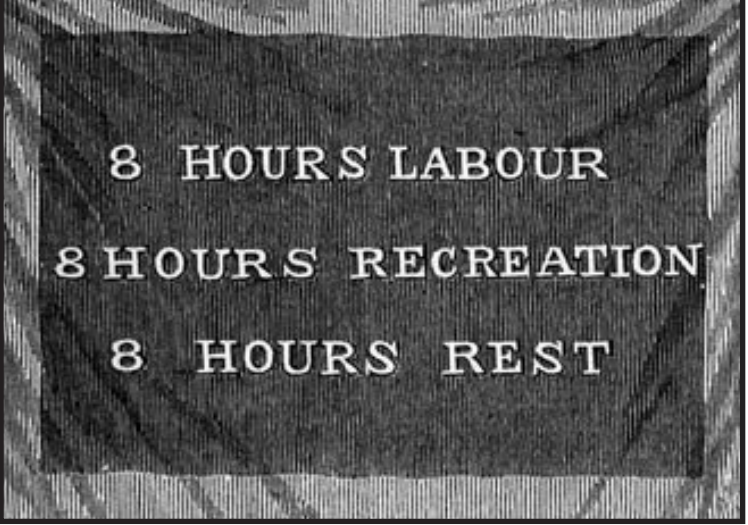

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

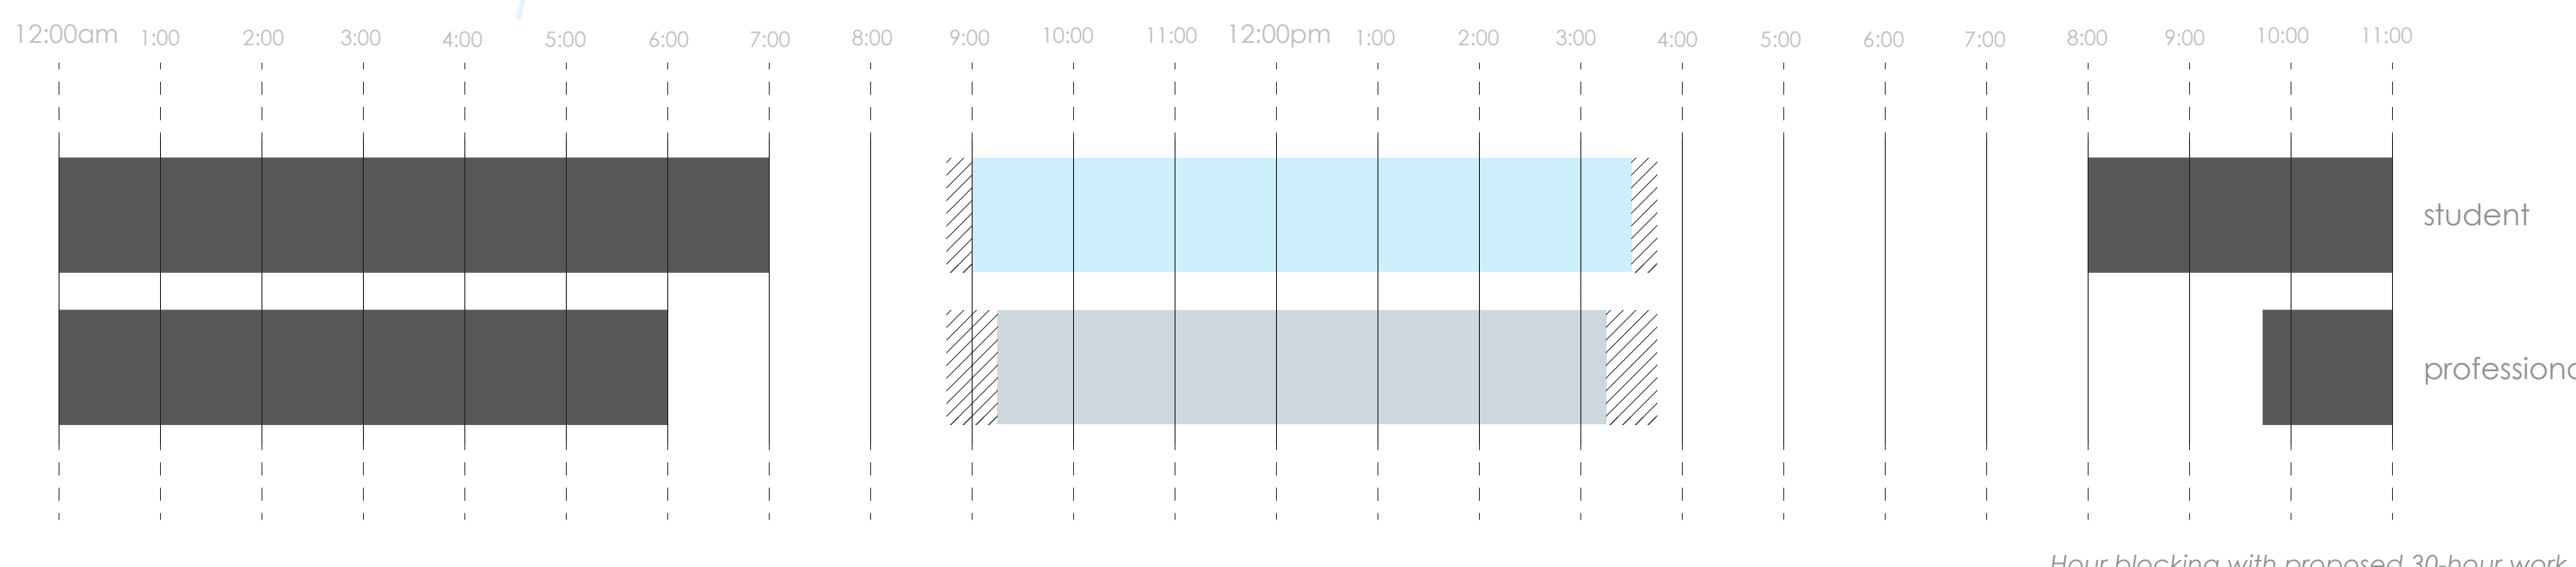

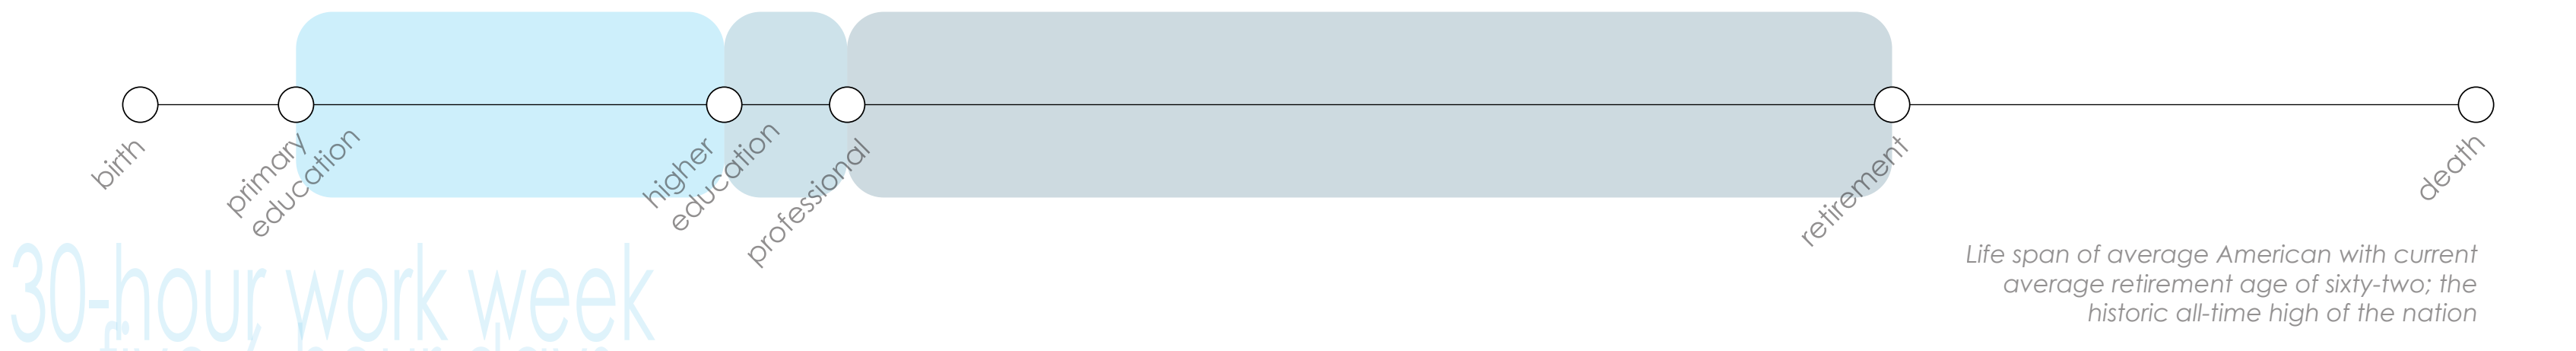

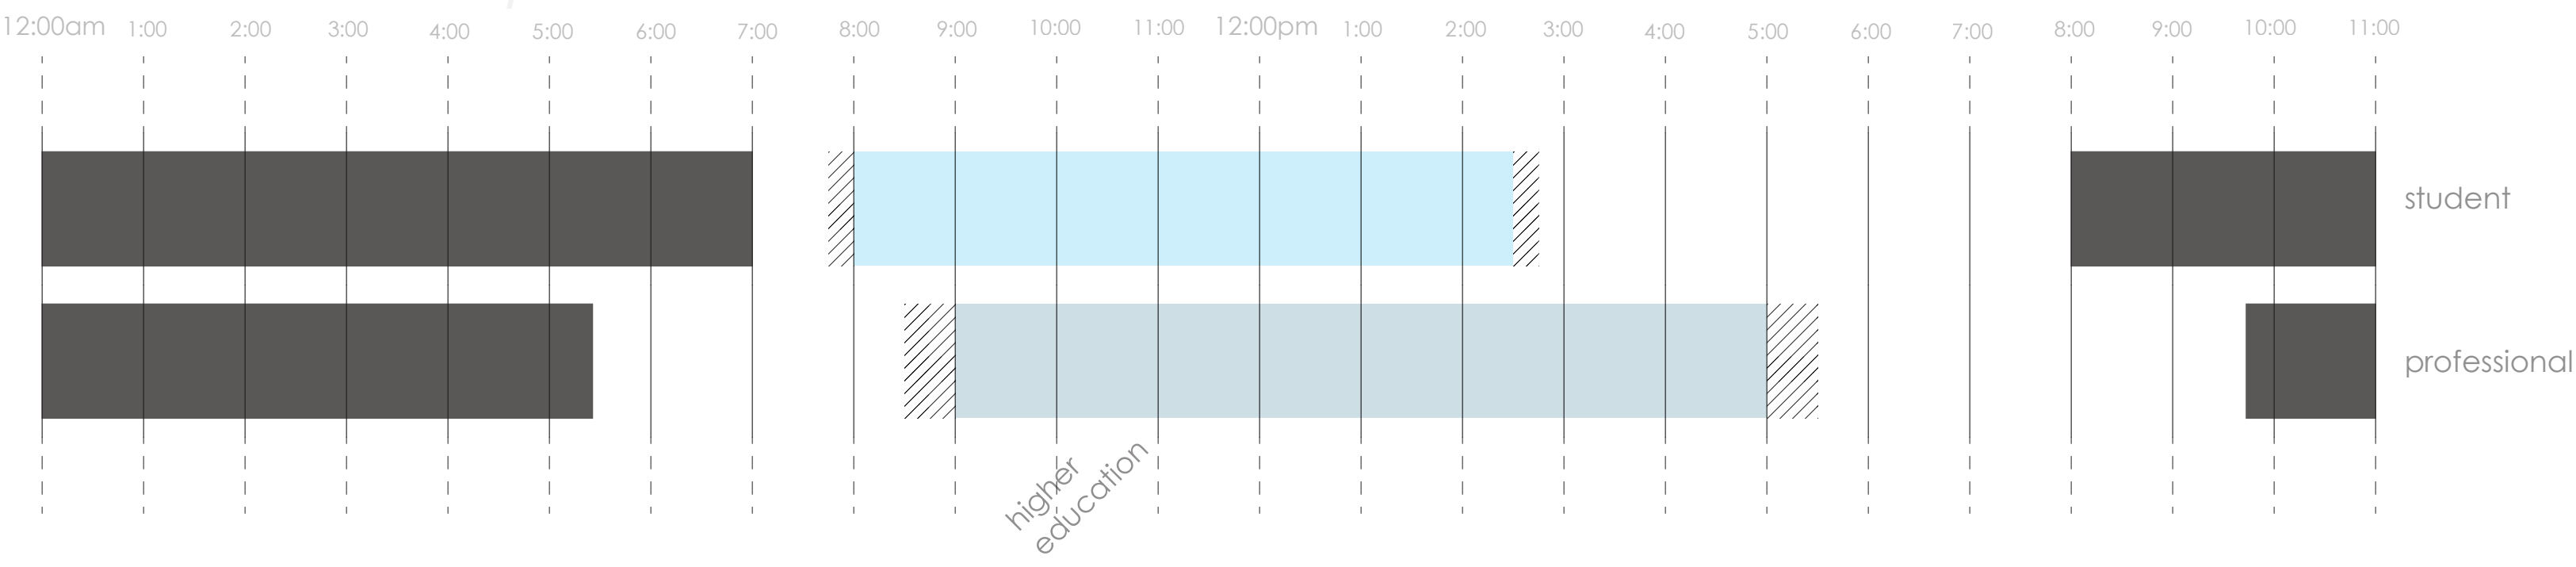

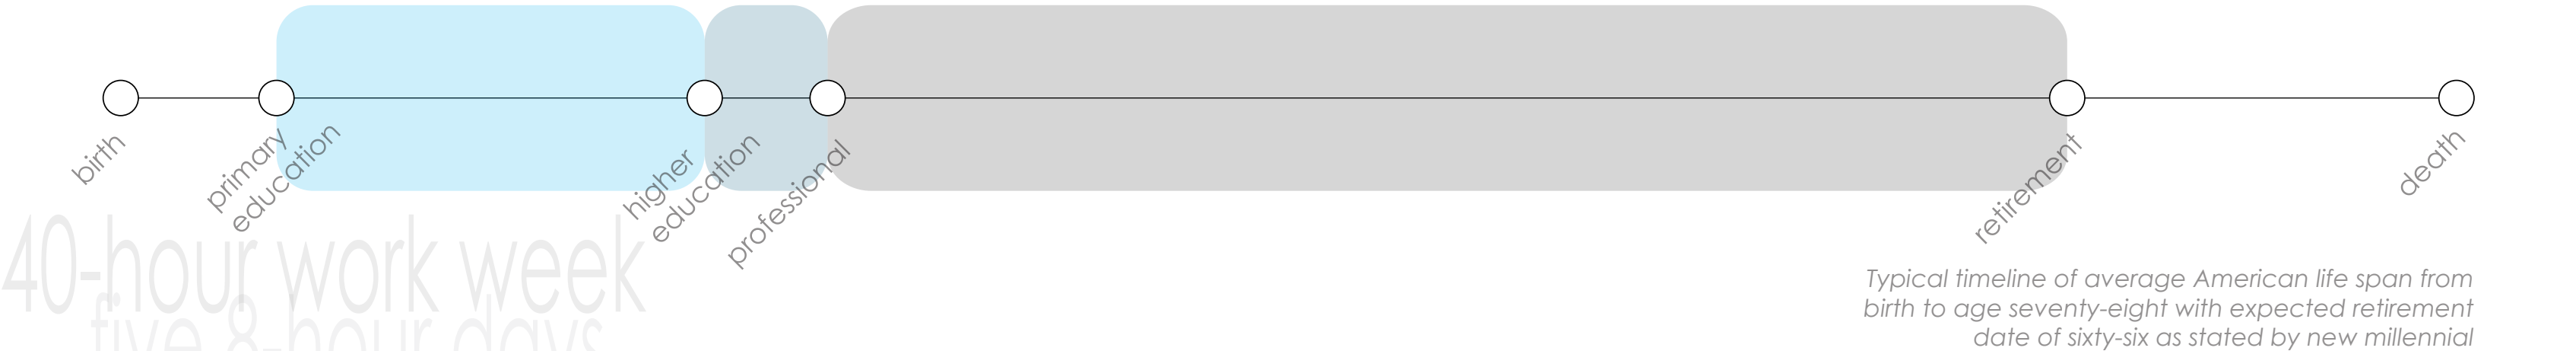

The average American with children, aged 25 - 54 years old, approximately 60% of the day is spent either at work or asleep leaving little time for leisure and/or family time after household duties are accomplished.

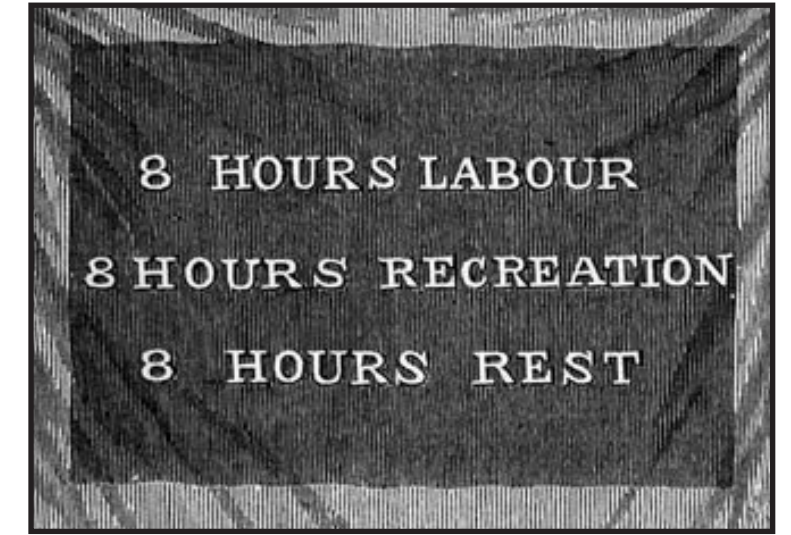

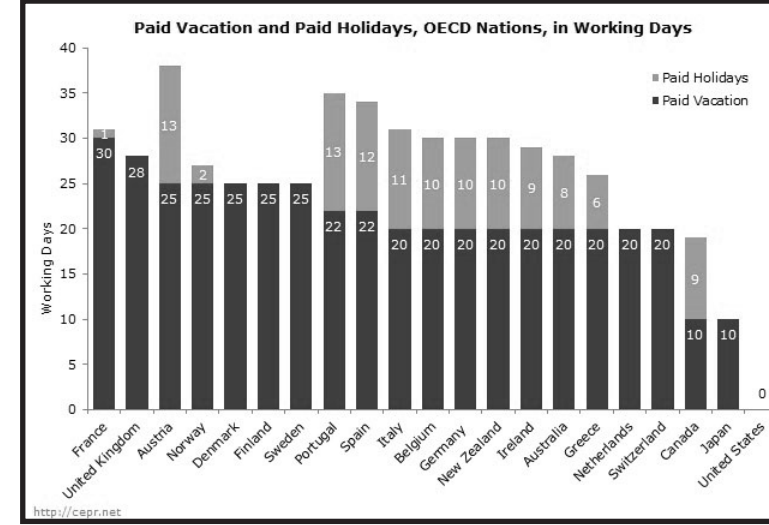

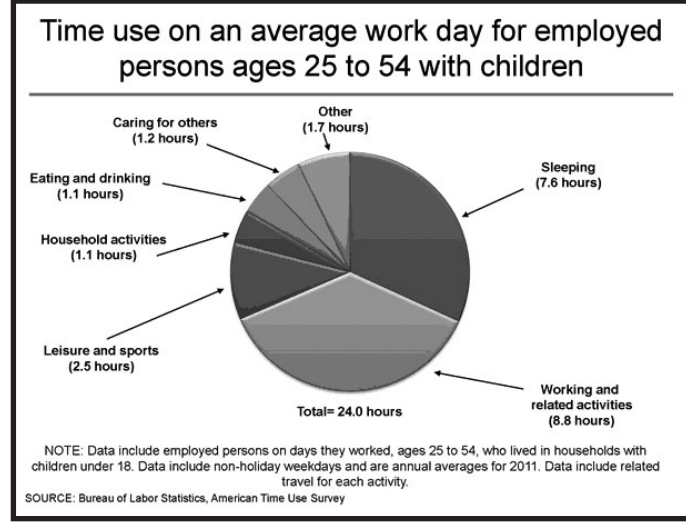

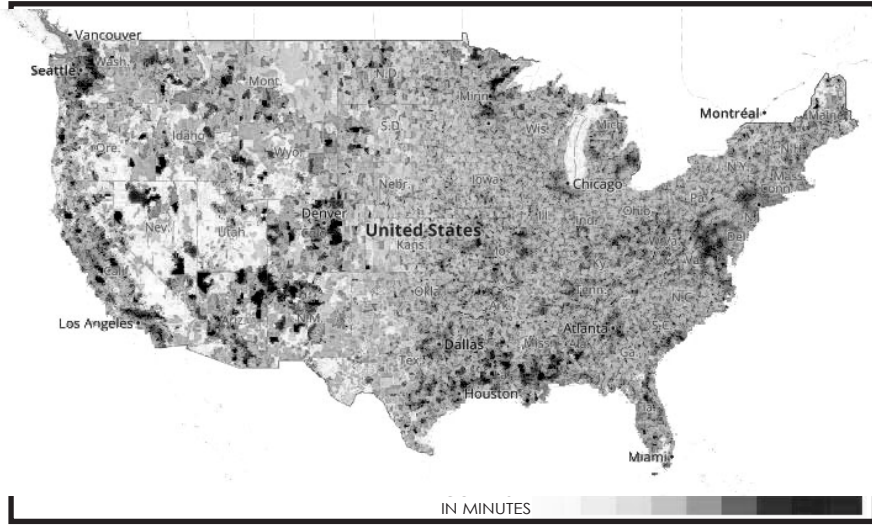

Americans spend more time annually at work than any other country in the world. The United States is the only developed nation without mandated paid time off and without paid parental time off offered to both parents.

The typical 8-hour work day was in response to the exhausting ten, twelve, and sixteen hour work days that arose as a product of industrialization and the strive for 24/7 optimization and efficiency.

Re-Working the Work-Week

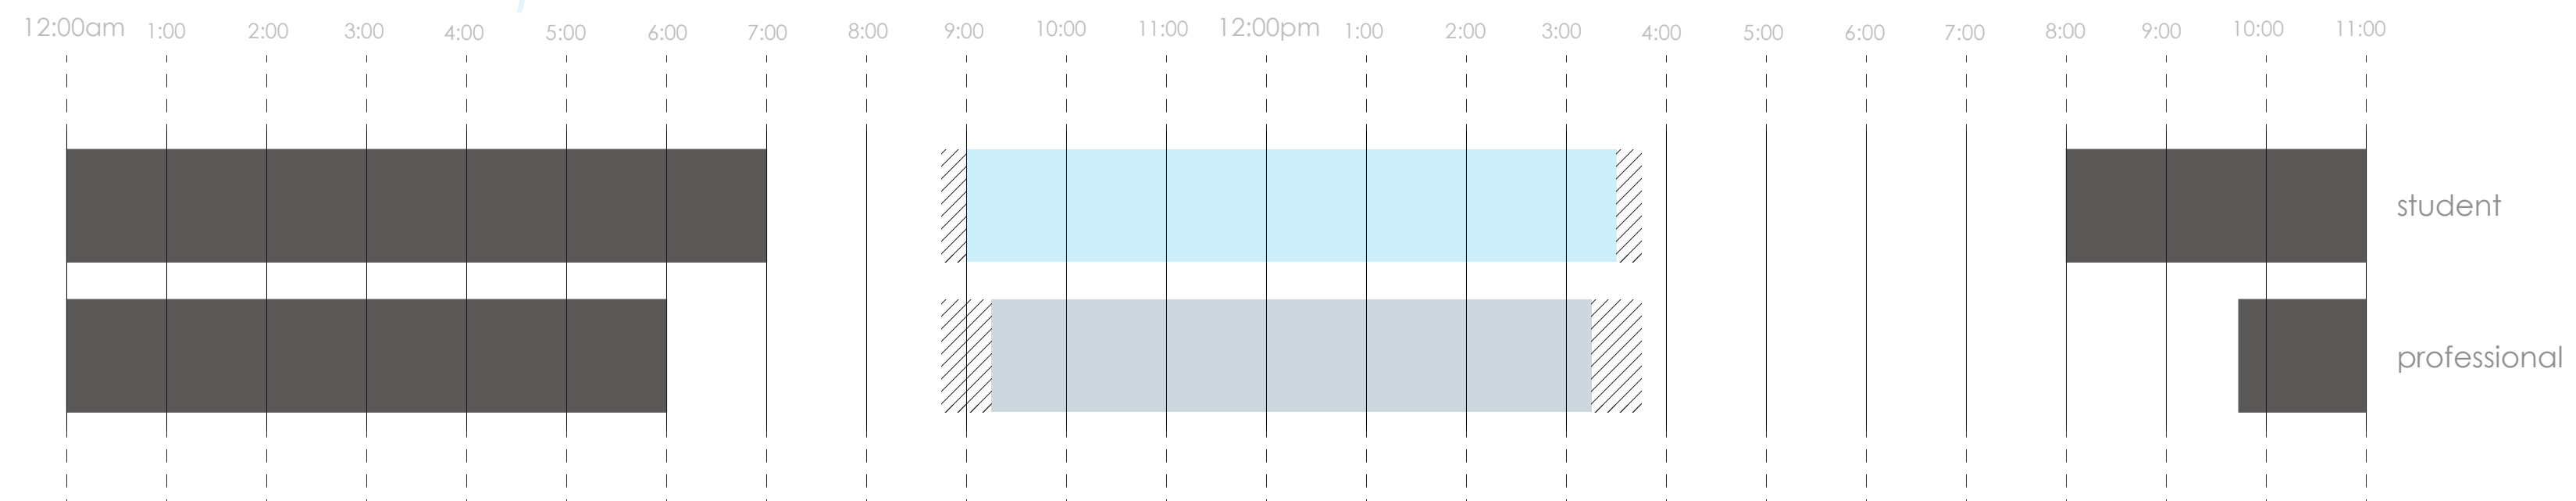

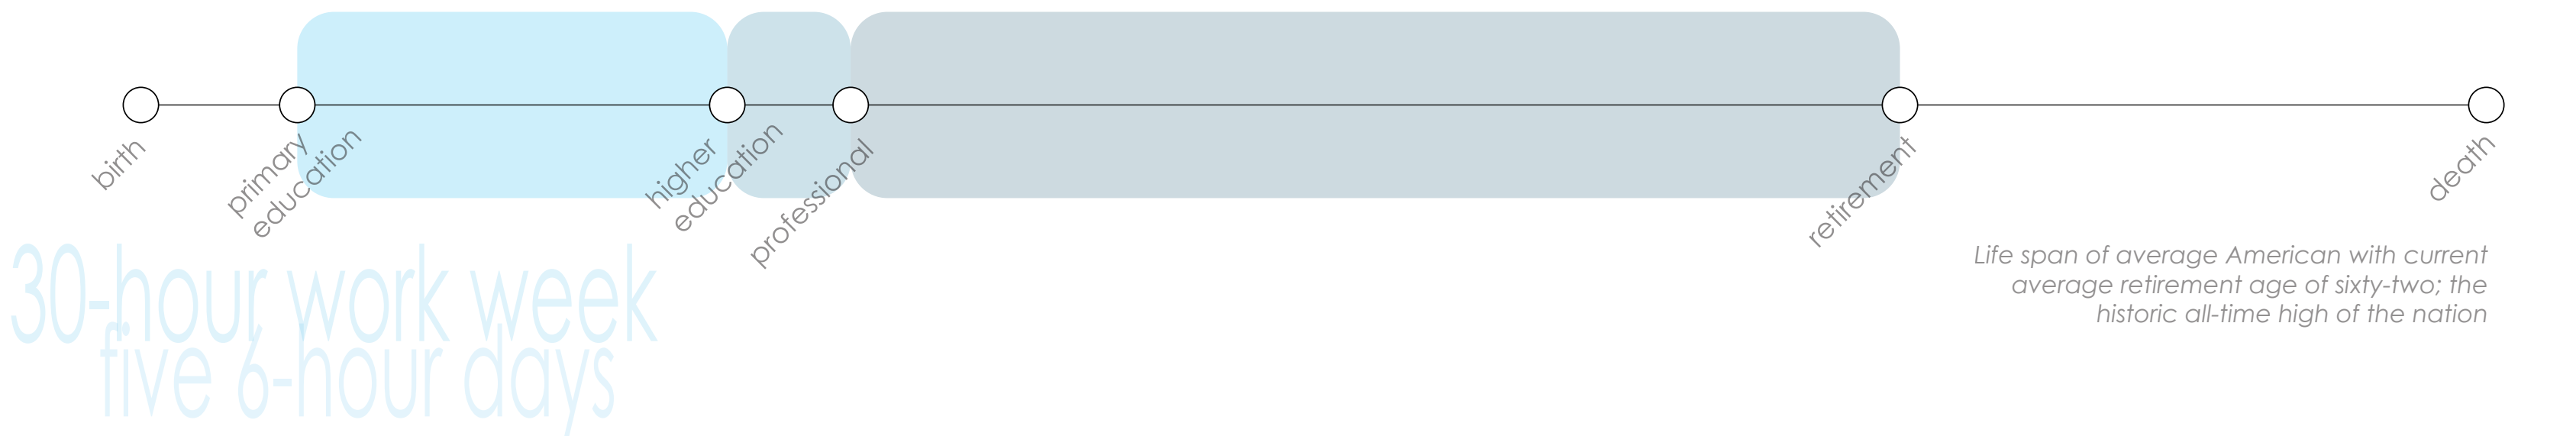

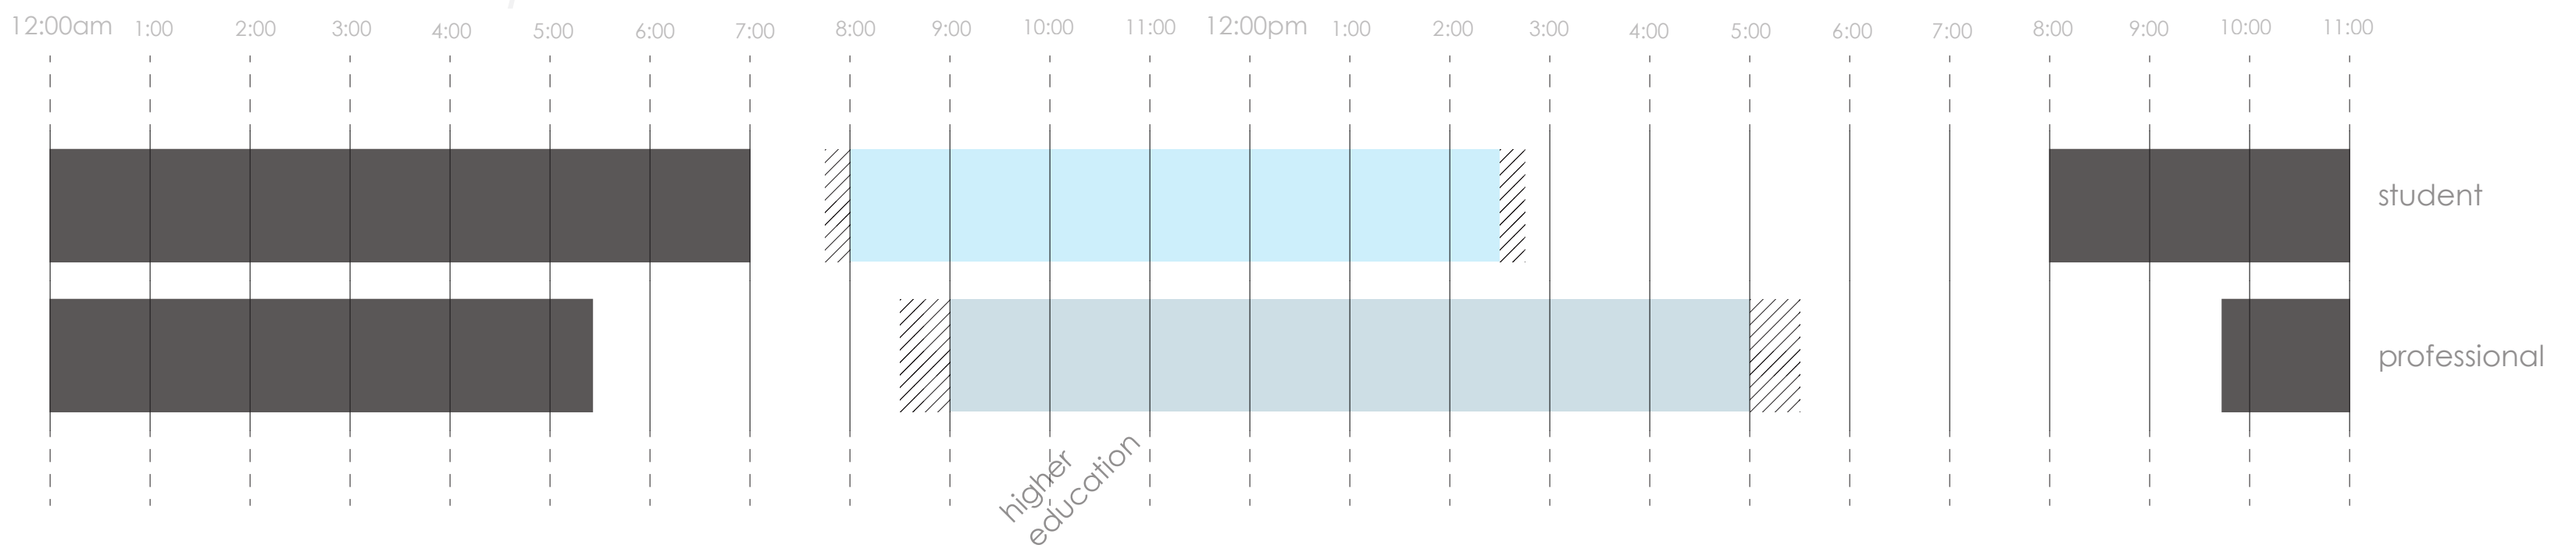

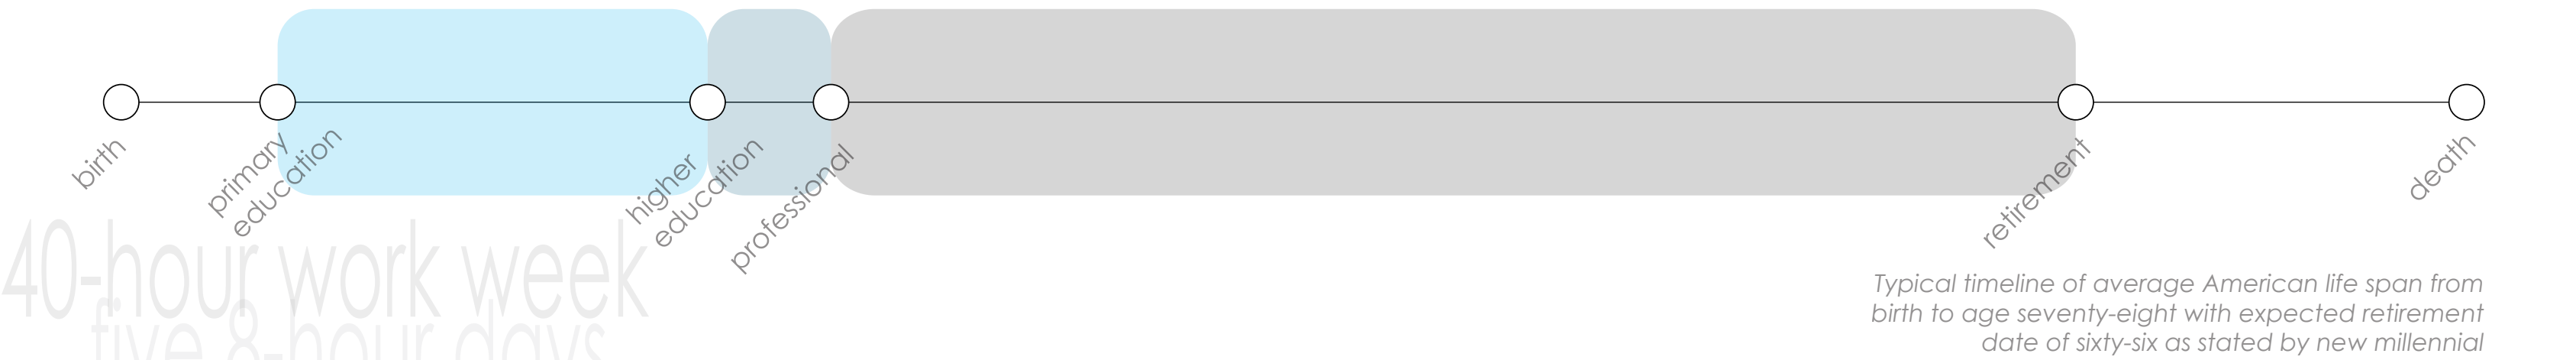

Average commute times in the United States are 25.4 minutes, ranging up to more than an hour. As population increases, the commute time is speculated to increase until it averages ninety minutes in 2050 as people are traveling farther to find work and sufficient pay.

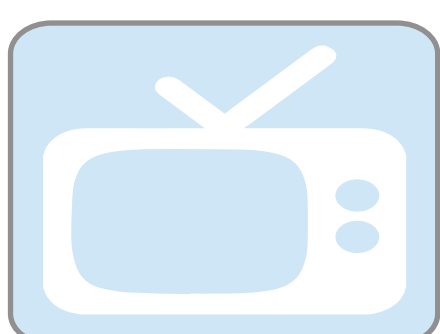

The average American with children, aged 25 - 54 years old, approximately 60% of the day is spent either at work or asleep leaving little time for leisure and/or family time after household duties are accomplished.

Americans spend more time annually at work than any other country in the world. The United States is the only developed nation without mandated paid time off and without paid parental time off offered to both parents.

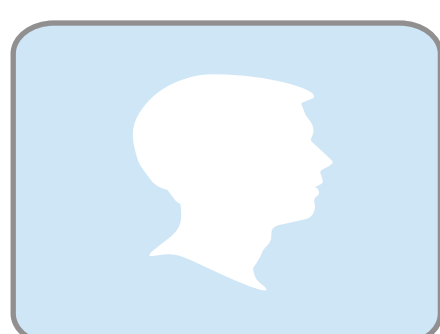

The typical 8-hour work day was in response to the exhausting ten, twelve, and sixteen hour work days that arose as a product of industrialization and the strive for 24/7 optimization and efficiency.

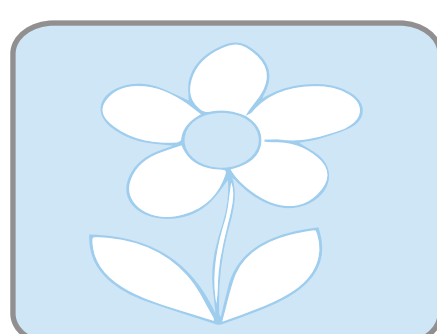

Shortening the work week helps to allow for both an alternative to the capitalist culture that perpetuates waste, over-work and the compulsion for more things, higher salaries, and thus longer hours; a shorter work week would also allow for a focus on the conventional issues of sustainability, giving more time to accommodate the perceived "inconveniences" with sustainable issues of time, cost, priorities + organization.

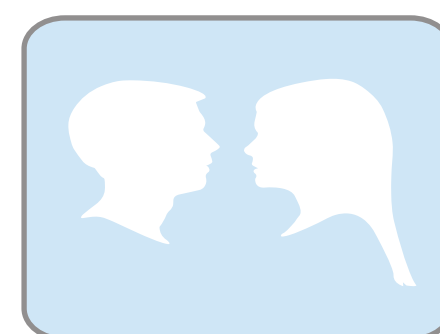

media +
information

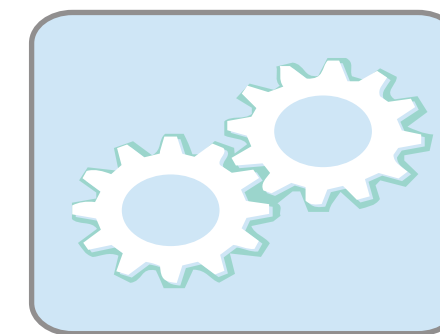

behavioral

ecological

cultural organization

economic